A better experience

A different challenge on course

Practising swing technique on the range is to be encouraged. But that practice doesn't examine game management skills. It doesn't test your decision-making.

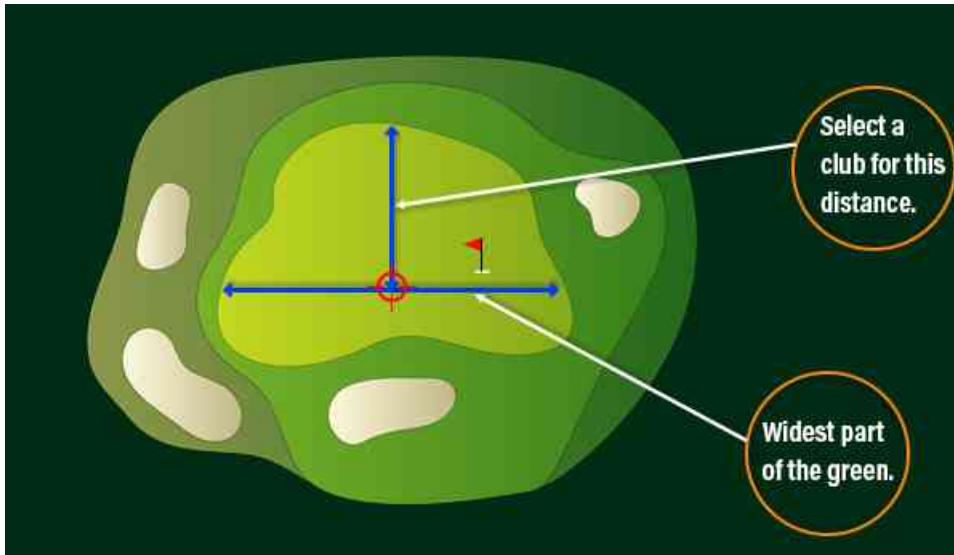

Play a 'practice round'. Try 9 holes (or more) focused on nothing but 'where you're aiming (and why)' and 'club selection'.

Here's a suggested practice approach:

On any shot over 80 metres, do NOT aim at the flag. Choose the widest area of the green and aim for the middle of that (allowing for your shot shape).

For club selection, choose a club that will hit a yardage number that is half-way from the centre of the green to the back edge. If that distance is at the limit of a particular club's distance, then club up.

Let us know how it went.

Another suggestion

Boring is exciting
 We have another suggestion intended to help your game management, decision-making and learning out on the course. It's called DPA.

DON'T BE TEMPTED

AIM FOR THE MIDDLE

Practise with a Professional

How often do you see the very best ball strikers on tour avoid aiming for the flag? They refuse to be tempted into a shot that offers One of the very best ways to practise out on the golf course is in a "playing lesson". We'd recommend either as an individual or as a group (to add to danger. Where on the green should you be aiming?

helpful
tip

Play a round where you prioritise hitting the green over attacking the flag. Focus on playing for the centre of the green. And then swing easier with an emphasis on solid ball striking.

By playing for the center of the green, you can drastically reduce the risk of landing in the trouble that surrounds the greens, which will in turn decrease those negative thoughts that can occasionally creep in throughout the round.

85

KEEP IT SIMPLE

Take bigger scores off your card and your scores will drop. For many golfers, 'breaking 85' means embracing simplicity in game management and their golf swing. If you want to talk about a simpler journey to under 85, then
